Key Takeaways

- Economic prospects are diverging still, even as global rate cuts begin in earnest.
- Easier monetary conditions favor credit, but political and macro risks still loom large.
- We expect only a small improvement in leveraged loan default rates.

Even as interest rates fall, economic prospects continue to diverge by region and sector. The global policy rate-easing cycle is now in full swing following a 50-basis-point (bp) cut by the U.S. Federal Reserve in mid-September; this creates space for a swath of central banks to follow suit, particularly in emerging markets. Economies remain more resilient than we had expected, but outcomes are diverging across the main regions. The U.S. is slowing, the eurozone is recovering, and China faces property-related headwinds. Global GDP growth remains subdued. We are forecasting 3.2% expansion in 2024, and 3.1% in 2025. The bright spots are economies with strong domestic demand or exposure to the global tech cycle. The risks to our baseline remain on the downside. These include sharply lower labor demand and a spike in bond yields and geopolitical risks; terminal policy rates (and neutral rates of interest) remain key unknowns.

Monetary easing is a credit positive, but political risks and diverging macro prospects still loom large. Credit conditions for borrowers in North America look set to steadily improve—although the looming U.S. elections could make for some financial market volatility and policy uncertainty. In Europe, the ECB and the Bank of England have (cautiously) started to dial back their restrictive policy stances, and the macro credit outlook remains broadly constructive. Asia-Pacific's credit backdrop is increasingly nuanced, amid mixed growth and interest rate prospects. In emerging markets, credit conditions will likely remain supportive for borrowers as long as a soft landing continues in the U.S.

We expect the U.S. leveraged loan default rate to remain near 1.50% through June 2025, from 1.55% as of June 2024. Leveraged loan issuers have been benefiting from tailwinds including the buildup to interest rate cuts, strong financing conditions, and a flurry of refinancings that have reduced near-term maturities. While these factors already contributed to a 0.5-percentage-point decline in the default rate from February to June, further declines could be hard to come by.

Although benchmark interest rates are beginning to subside, rate cuts won't translate instantly to lower borrowing costs for many borrowers who must wait for loan rates to reset.

China policies are exerting a heavy influence on corporates, encouraging entities toward favored initiatives such as decarbonization, technology self-sufficiency, and industrial upgrading. We believe China is moving from a reliance on debt-driven sectors such as property and infrastructure, to higher-growth sectors with global ambitions. While policy-favored sectors' returns on capital are not matching their capital expenditure, we believe such entities' more conservative approach to debt should bolster credit profiles.

The gap is widening between China's policy-supported sectors and other sectors

Policy-favored sectors are autos, capital goods, solar/lithium batteries, technology hardware, technology software and services, and utilities. *Gross debt to EBITDA in 2023. ‡Growth over the past four years. Sources: S&P Global Ratings, S&P Capital IQ, Wind.

China's stimulus efforts will test the banking sector. China's central bank said it will cut interest rates on existing mortgages by 50 bps on average, as part of a set of steps aimed at stimulating the economy. This will likely squeeze Chinese banks. We believe the measures could strain lenders' net interest margins and mortgage quality. The steps will test banks' management of funding costs and their underwriting ability, with some institutions likely to show lower profitability and diminished asset quality. This should be particularly apparent for regional banks in lower-tier cities due to their exposure to some of the country's weaker property markets.

The refinancing of private debt with public debt was a notable new trend in Europe over the first half of 2024. Issuers have taken advantage of tight interest rate margins in public debt markets to refinance private debt, reversing the refinancing flows of recent years. Deals have delivered a median 150 bps improvement in interest margins, based on our study of 17 issuers that refinanced private debt mainly in the broadly syndicated loan (BSL) market. The refinancing trend should continue so long as public market credit spreads remain attractive and supported by stable economic and geopolitical conditions.
